Barn:

South of the house on the west side and right next to the old road between Port Republic and Broomes Island is a tobacco barn of some age.

This is a large barn which in its original state consisted of three bays and a shed. The main block still is a tri-partite barn with a central passage. The construction is post-and-beam with heavy hewn members joined via mortise-and-tenon with trunnels. Many of the older hewn pieces have been replaced by circular sawn pieces and nailed into place. The main block measures 52' x 20' and was divided by four transverse sills. It is a thirteen-room barn. The side plates are scarfed at approximately mid point, and it is supposed that the sills were not continuous but broken at the side doors. This heavy frame rests on piers of about 16" in height that are made of either scrap brick or fieldstones.

On the south wall of the main block, the lack of nail holes on the south rafters plus the wide spacing of what appears to be original siding are indications that the 14' shed on this side is original. It may have housed a press. There are no sills in this portion of the barn, and it is supported by tree-posts mortised into hewn plates and fixed with pegs. The 52' side plate is scarf-joined in the middle over the entrance.

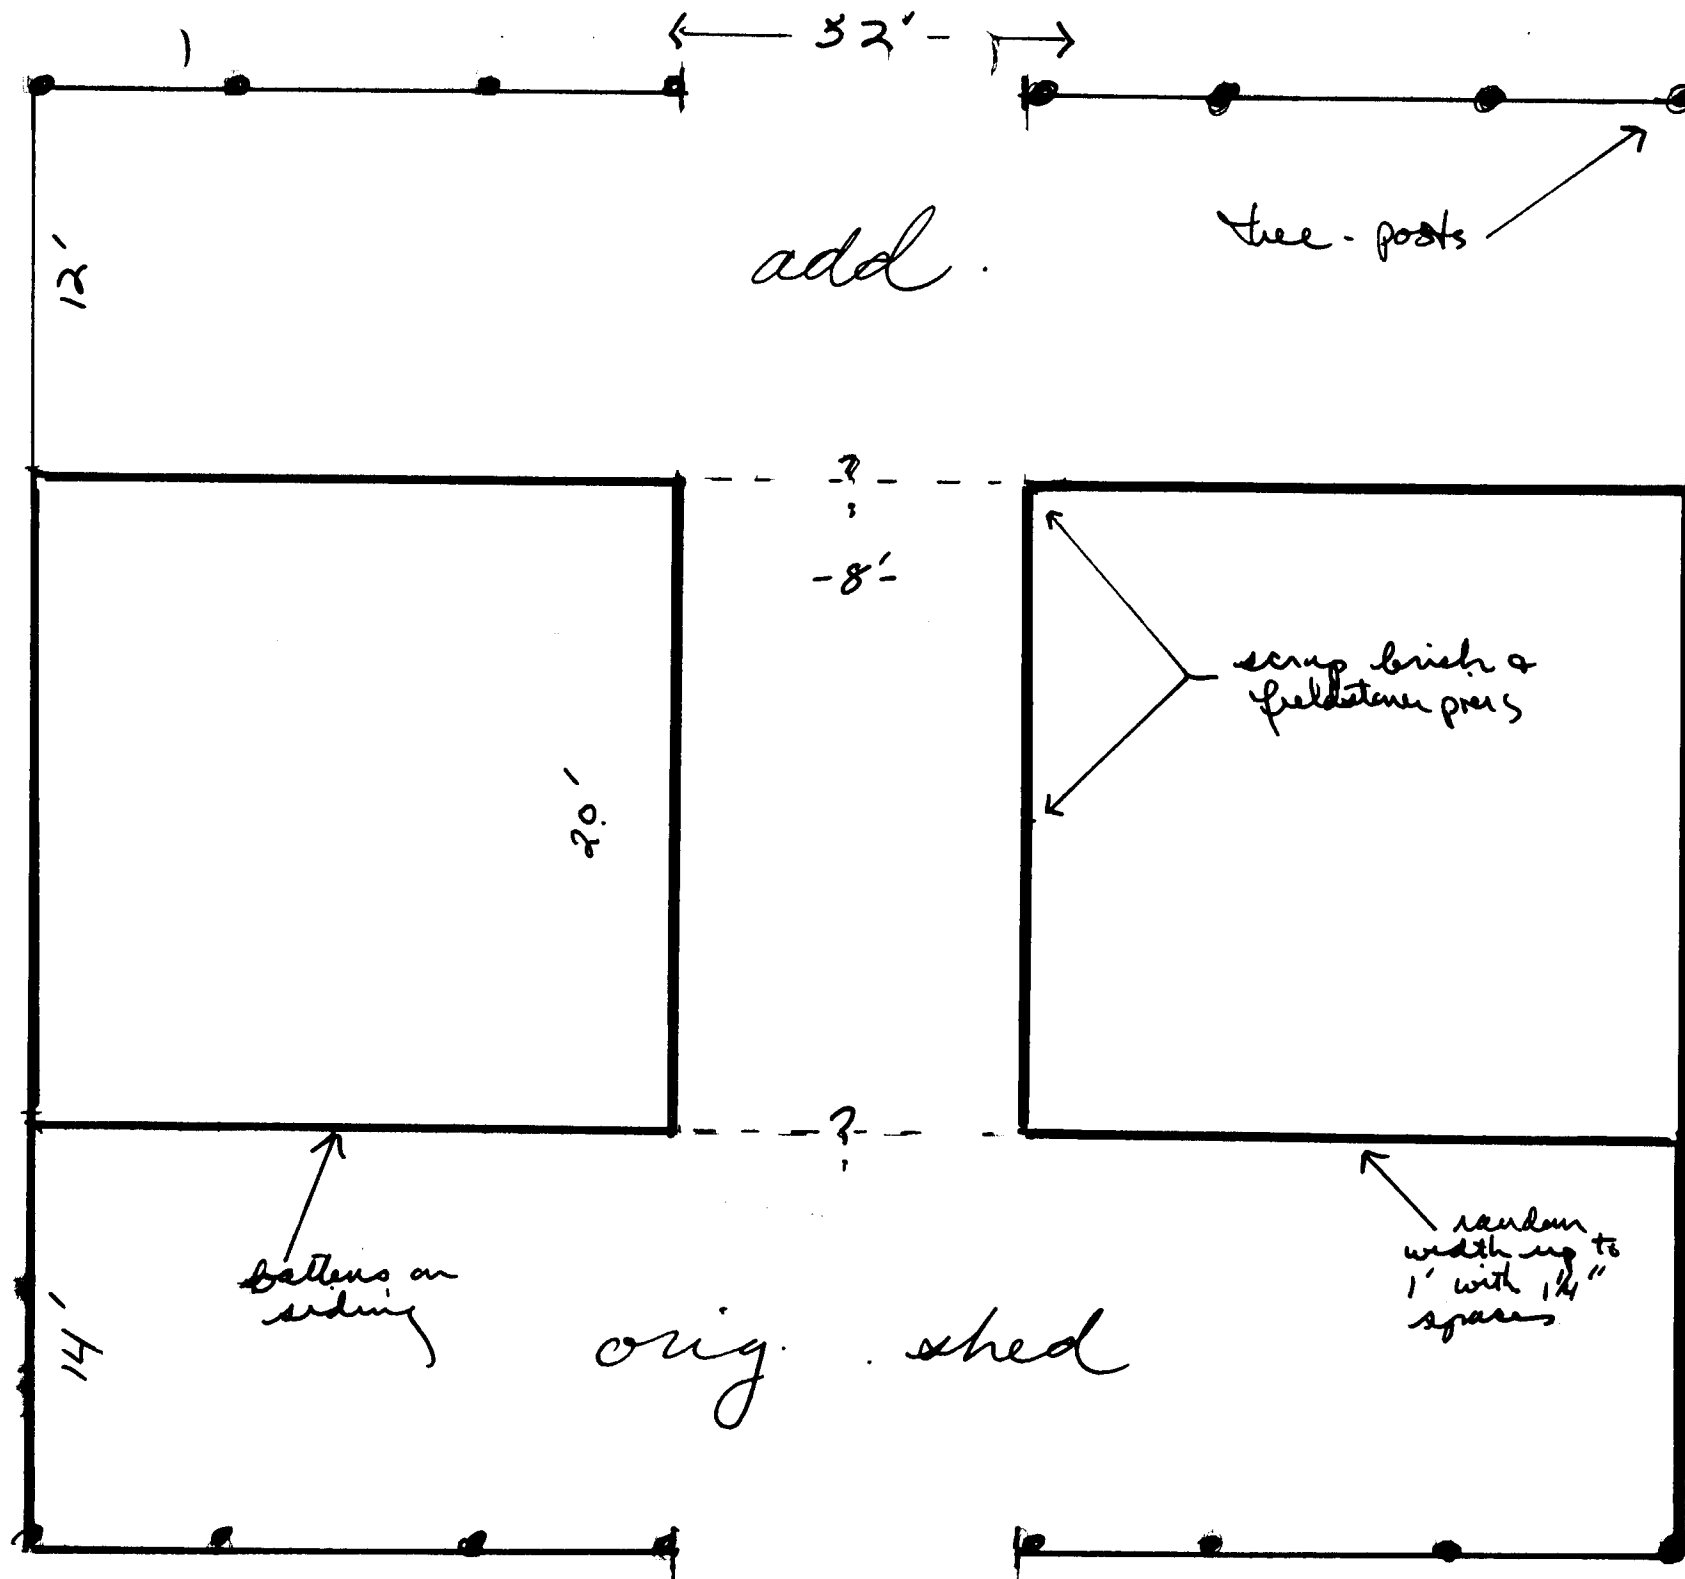

The presence of this shed makes covering the west wall of the main block practically unnecessary. That the random width weatherboards of that wall have $1\frac{1}{2}$ " spaces inbetween them suggests an awareness of the fact. It is possible that the shed may not have been enclosed originally and then would only suffice to keep out precipitation but not damaging winds.

The presence of battens on the west end of the south wall may be the result of having housed livestock, and it may also be an indication that a "curing apparatus" was used. Ollie Bowen (age eighty-nine years) remembers that either this barn or the one within sight of it on an adjoining property had such a device.

Although it contains the same type and age materials as the rest of the barn, the north shed does not appear to be original. It is 12' x 52' and is also supported by tree-posts mortised into hewn plates. Its rafters join the north wall at the plates, however, where those of the south shed are integrated into the roof frame of the main block. Nail holes and broken nails on the outside of the north wall of the main structure indicate that this wall contained flush siding exposed to the weather.

The nails in the original siding and in the rafters and collars are square head machine-cut nails.
